Q: Curious about comment on 'Science and Orthodoxy' papers It would help me a lot if anyone could provide link to the site, article in question, and the comment that was posted. I googled and came across few articles mentioning the same question, but I was wondering if the question or the answer is valid. Question: "The idea of the natural law also explains why there is a poverty of normative reason, of principles or norms that everyone has reason to adopt. It seems to me plausible that the natural, common law of morality is the most important law of nature." "Why is morality simply too strong of a norm to be found?" "[...] I hope that the idea of the natural law and its corollary, the poverty of normative reason, play a decisive role in explaining and perhaps even solving this puzzle." See: Canon and Moral Reality The "law of nature" has never been defined. Comment: I think it may be a valid explanation and challenge that natural law is nothing but convention. Any input from anyone is welcome. A: "Why is morality simply too strong of a norm to be found?" This is a question about morality not about science. Science shows that morality is indeed stronger than the natural law. Therefore we don't have to accept the natural law. For the sake of morality we could reject the natural law. See the essay by Charles Handy. "Morality on the Nature's Law". "Why is morality simply too strong of a norm to be found?" This question is about the natural law. If it is true that the natural law is true the question shouldn't be asked in this way. If the natural law is true then the question is already answered. That is why people don't seek the natural law. We do the moral thing because it's the right thing to do, not because of some law. Law defines the moral thing to do, but not why we should do it. It doesn't tell us why we should be good. Morality is all about why you should do good things. We do the moral thing because it's the right thing to do, not because of some law. We do the moral things because these things are right for human beings as such, not just because some laws happened to be made by some lawgiver (
